A note on travel restrictions to the United States:

Starting from January 26, anyone traveling to the United States will have to present a negative COVID-02 test result, taken three days (maximum) before travel in order to board their flight. All incoming passengers must also quarantine in the United States upon arrival. While the previous travel ban that prevented tourist travel from the Schengen Zone, the U.K., and Northern Ireland to the U.S. was lifted in the last days of the Trump administration, the incoming Biden administration is expected to reinstate these restrictions. You can read the full presidential proclamation on domestic and international travel here.

If you have any questions regarding these changes and how they affect your plans for studying in the U.S., please contact the EducationUSA team.

Tips for contacting admissions officers

Do you have specific questions about a school's academic programs or campus life? Sending an email to the school's admissions office will get you the information you need and show your enthusiasm for the school. But before you contact your dream school, read our tips about how best to communicate with admissions offices.

1. Keep it short: focus on your question, not on yourself. This is not the time to share how qualified you are, or why you deserve to be admitted into this program.
2. Do a spell check: Check for spelling and grammar errors, then check again! Mistakes will happen, but try your hardest to make your communication professional and coherent.
3. Be professional: Include a subject line, salutation, body and signature. Also, double-check your email address. If it's anything other than a form of your name or initials, consider creating a new one for corresponding with schools.
4. Be polite: Take time to thank whoever is corresponding with you. If you receive a reply, make sure you get back to the admissions officer right away. Think of any conversations you have with schools as an extension of your application.
