For undergraduate applicants: Preparing for the new SATs

For any current high school students considering applying to an undergraduate program in the United States next year, you are probably familiar with the SATs. It is a standardized assessment test that is frequently required by colleges and universities to evaluate prospective students. But did you know that as of March 2016, the format of the SATs is changing? Among some changes, the now required essay portion will become optional.

The New York Times recently published an article outlining the changes, to help students and families better prepare.
