Winter is Application Season, Too!

Dear Readers,

Most deadlines for applying for fall 2017 admission to U.S. colleges and universities have passed, but there are still many opportunities to work and study in the U.S. next year. Check out the list of schools in focus we have included below, all of which are still accepting applications. Also take a look at two fully-funded work training programs—one in entrepreneurship and one in language education—described on page three.

Are you wondering which university or college might be right for you? Journalists at University World News argue that ranking isn't everything. While a university's ranking on lists published by outlets like U.S. News and World Report might give you a rough idea of their reputation, the authors make the point that ranking places too much emphasis on a university's research output and not enough on the quality of its teaching. The authors' conclusion? Consider middle-ranked universities, because many might provide teaching on par with top-tier schools. Read the full piece here.

Are you currently studying in a Hungarian university and thinking about transferring to a U.S. college or university? A new article by an international student studying in Boston explains the steps you need to take to transfer to your school of choice. Her main point: focus your applications essays on your specific academic interests and why they make a good fit with your chosen school.

As always, email or call us with any questions or to arrange a one-on-one consultation with our staff.
