April is National Parks and Environment Month

Dear Readers,

Many international students are drawn to studying in the U.S. because of the country's relatively strong job market, academic resources, and vibrant culture. But there is an equally valid—if not as commonly mentioned—reason to move to the U.S.: the beauty of the outdoors.

April is designated as the month of National Parks and the Environment in the United States, and this issue of the EducationUSA newsletter focuses on several colleges that are situated close to areas of natural beauty.

From Susquehanna University, located nearby two sprawling state forests in the Northeast, to Saint Michael's college, nestled in the shoreline of Vermont's tranquil Lake Champlain, the schools featured in this issue offer easy access to outdoor activities such as hiking, boating, and camping. Many universities are still accepting applications to join their fall 2017 classes, and some are still offering scholarships for internationals.

If you are planning to carry your love of the outdoors into the classroom and study either environmental studies or sustainability, you should consider applying for these scholarships.

Later in the issue read about upcoming events for students interested in studying law or business in the U.S. at the graduate level.
